Most states use the total population numbers exactly as provided by the census. Who can receive information and in what capacity or timeframe?

In general, states redistrict early in every decade, after Census data is released. This is important, especially when large draft maps may be available for viewing by members—but must be secured. If so, why do those exist? Royalty, you may also like: It is likely that one or two people will be trained to run the software, and all requests will filter through those few hands-on people. By going this route, it is less likely that any voters will be assigned to the wrong precinct.
