Language, being something so widely shared, offers an abundance of data for observation. We get a lot of introduction to the world that Ms.

Instead, these conceptions function to make us aware of qualities in objects. As a result, Reid's reference to beliefs held in common across time and place, across culture and religion, functions as an empirically justified generalization about species-typical features of human cognition. One fundamental implication of this structural similarity reconfirms the point of the section about moral judgment above, namely, moral judgment is assertoric and not merely affective.

Here I repudiate the sentimentalists' swayward account of moral judgment, and I
