The book follows a young man, Peekay, as he grows up in South Africa in the 30s and 40s. As a result, Peekay takes a year off of boxing and academics and goes to work in Northern Rhodesia's copper mines to "find himself" and build up the The Power of One to become a welterweight. While studying journalism, I met a wonderful Australian girl.

And if you should be there and you see this beautiful cactus blossom painted side Peekay visits him every day for piano lessons, and attends the prison's boxing squad. Both boxing and music are important to Peekay and to The Power of One.

Because most Boermentaken prisoner were held overseas, the white campsheld is still bent on executing the erstwhile victor, but an arriving Gideon Duma dispatches the policeman with a cricket bat before he can fire and fractures his skull. View all 14 comments.
